"I have a new neighbor," Sarah said when Ellen finally answered her phone.

"Hi to you too," Ellen commented. She knew her sister too well, and if she wasn't living in her head she was basically asleep.

"Hey Ellen. How was your day? I have a new neighbor. Is that better?" Sarah asked sarcastically.

Ellen shook her head while laughing into the phone. "Okay. What's so important that you need to call me about your neighbor?"

"She's hot," Sarah said with more excitement than she had had about anyone in a long while.

"Ahh, we have hit the root of the conversation. Is she gay?"

"Yup, has to be."

"Do you really think that it's smart to have the hots for your next door neighbor?"

"I didn't say I was going to ask her out." I am so going to ask her out Sarah thought. "I just said she was nice to look at."

Right from the beginning, Sarah was completely taken with her new neighbor. She knew that she needed to trust her instincts that Andie was a good person. Yet she had lost some confidence in her own intuition after dealing with a jealous exgirlfriend.

Using her dog as an ice breaker, Sarah invited Andie over for dinner and a doggie play date. Andie gratefully agreed knowing she had no food in the refrigerator and she would much rather spend time with her beautiful golden blond neighbor than to unpack the boxes in each room of her new house.

What they didn't realize was that they were in for a bumpy ride when coming face to face with Sarah's past.
